The Millennium Village was sponsored by the Government as an environmentally sustainable residential development on a brownfield site. The school and health centre, commissioned by English Partnerships, also had to meet high standards of environmentally sustainable performance. The health centre generated the need to achieve a balance between the preferred environmental systems and required standards of confidentiality and limiting the potential spread of infection within the building. The building is designed to provide a range of flexible spaces which can accommodate future developments in services.

Our understanding of primary care, and the implications of developing trends for an increasing range of services to be delivered, enabled us to create a design that proactively supports the provision of new services and will meet the needs of the future.

In addition to being part of the Design Team, Ann Noble Architects was commissioned by the PCT to develop their brief for the Centre.
